REPORT FROM THE COMMISSION ON THEOLOGY:
A STATEMENT ON RELATIONS BETWEEN JEWS AND CHRISTIANS
RECEIVED by the General Assembly

Preface: The Enormity of the Problem

Why is it imperative that Christians in the late twentieth century take up the responsibility to rethink their understanding of the relation between the church and the Jewish people? Why is it urgent that Christians learn new ways of talking about and acting toward the Jewish people? Answers to these questions will set the report from the Commission on Theology in context and enable Disciples to grasp the significance of the task which the General Assembly assigned to the Commission.

Since the first century, Jews and Christians have shared a common history. Jews know this history very well, Christians hardly at all. Although Jesus of Nazareth was a Jew among Jews, whose birth was proclaimed by Simeon as "a light for revelation to the Gentiles and for glory to your people Israel" (Luke 2:32), within a century his followers had begun to distance themselves from the people of Israel and to define themselves as the "new Israel." As the "new Israel," they claimed to have displaced the Jewish people (the "old Israel") in the covenant with God. This language of an "old" and a "new" Israel is not in the New Testament and has no biblical warrant. The church talked of the people Israel as a people that should not and would not exist save for the willful "blindness" and "obstinacy" by which Jews avoid disappearing. An unremitting parody of evil was projected upon the people Israel. They have been viewed as everything old, carnal, ethnocentric, and disobedient that the new, spiritual, universal, obedient Gentile church displaces, and Christians as everything good that Jews can never be.

Beginning in the fourth century, the church passed laws defining relations between Christians and Jews, and ensuring that the situation of Jews in the society and economy mirrored the image of them in Christian rhetoric. Each of Hitler's laws found its precedent in a law passed by councils of the church. For example, the requirement that all Jews wear the Star of David found its antecedent in a law forbidding Jews to wear the cross. Such laws become necessary when the church has ceased to be the man of God to whom cooperation and partnership are properly due.
(2) While this confession has often been used as a pretext for Christians to contend that God has rejected Israel, canceled God's covenant with Israel, and replaced Israel with the church, it is clear that these past emphases and their practical, historical consequences of encouraging persecution of Jews by Christians, represent a profound misunderstanding of God and Jesus Christ, Israel and the church. We confess and repent of the church's long and deep collusion in the spread of anti-Jewish attitudes and actions through its "teaching of contempt" for Jews and Judaism. We disclaim such teaching and the acts and attitudes which it reflects and reinforces.

(3) God's presence in Jesus Christ for the redemption of the world is rooted in God's call and election of Israel. Thus, to affirm that presence is to join with Judaism in affirming God's election of Israel and God's purpose to bring blessing to all the families of the earth through Abraham (Gen. 12:3). We confess that both the church and the Jewish people are elected by God for witness to the world and that the relation of the Church and the Jewish people to each other is grounded on God's gracious election of each.

(4) It is indispensable to an adequate and truthful understanding of God's action in Jesus Christ that it be seen in continuity with God's unsearchable and particular election and covenant with Israel. God is faithful to that covenant in the historical life of Israel, whether or not Israel is itself faithful, just as God is faithful to the Church in spite of its sin and rebellion. The God who calls Israel and acts in Israel's life is the God who creates all things and has acted in Jesus Christ.

(5) The distinctive work of God in Jesus Christ, which often has been seen by Christians as a sign of God's election of the Jews, is rather a sign of the continuing affirmation of God's election of Israel and the Jewish people. We confess that the covenant established by God's grace with the Jewish people has not been abrogated but remains valid, precisely because "the gifts and the call of God are irrevocable" (Rom. 11:29).

(6) The Jewishness of Jesus ties Christians to Jews both historically and theologically. Jesus was shaped by and lived in the midst of Jewish traditions and culture, and understood his life and ministry to be, at least, for and with the Jews. A "non-Jewish Jesus," or even an indifferent Jewish Jesus, is one of the most unhistorical and corrupting myths which later church theology and practice have perpetrated. The Jewishness of Jesus deepens the tragedy of Christian mistreatment of the Jewish people. In this regard, the church has historically blamed the Jewish people for the crime of "deicide" (the killing of God) in the crucifixion of Jesus. This we now declare to be a theological and historical error. Although the historical details surrounding Jesus' death are not fully clear, it is evident that Jesus died as a result of the Roman imperial system and with the collusion of some of his fellow Jews. At the same time, we must understand that the crucifying actions of Jesus' contemporaries are representative of humanity as such, and are not peculiarly Jewish or Roman. Certainly history has witnessed the same crucifying actions by Christians toward Jews. The primary point of the Christian understanding of Jesus' crucifixion is the acknowledgment of God's unsearchably loving presence and action in Jesus' death and thereby God's final redemptive presence in any human situation.

(7) Still, in the heart of the Christian confession is a profound sense that what God has done in Jesus Christ is a new event, unintelligible apart from Israel's story, but not merely a repetition of that story. Christians affirm that this new event is the Good News of God's taking up the cause both of Israel and of all humanity, and fulfilling Israel's and humanity's call to love and do justice before God and neighbor. This God in Jesus Christ has radically declared an unfathomable grace and love for Israel and for all humanity, grace and love moving God's creative work and hope toward which all creation moves. This new event in Jesus of Nazareth does not cancel or reject Israel, even if most Jews then and now were either indifferent to Jesus or rejected the affirmations of lordship and dignity about Jesus.

(8) Jews and Christians share a history, a body of scripture, a communal and ethical tradition, and a treasury of prayers, although each has its own distinctive literature—the New Testament for Christians, the Talmud and midrash for Jews. And for both, history under God continues, requiring a continuing reclaiming of the truth and power of God's revelation in every generation. Thus, the unending task of interpretation requires Christians to be attentive to God's ongoing work of redemption among Jews as well as Christians.

(9) Christians must acknowledge that the language of invective, condemnation, and rejection against Jews, vexing and difficult as it is to understand, is present in the New Testament and throughout most traditions of the church. This language has all too often gone hand in hand with actions undertaken by Christians against Jews. The church has repeatedly forgotten that the grace and love of God evident in Jesus Christ is for Israel and all Jews; and it is not a blessing dependent for its ultimate efficacy on how righteous or faithful or "Christian" one might be. God does not bestow God's grace and love on the church because the church is righteous and faithful. Both Jews and Christians have standing before God because and only because of the grace of the God who ever justifies the unrighteous.
(10) Although we do not want to say Judaism is for Jews and the church for Gentiles, we must acknowledge that the continued existence of Jewish people who do not confess the lordship of Jesus Christ and who see their Jewishness as incompatible with this confession is, as Paul the apostle declares, a mystery and witness to the church: “O the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments and how inscrutable his ways” (Romans 11:33)! The church must receive this mystery and witness as essential to its own identity and destiny.

(11) While we want to propose more vigorous study and conversation between Christians and Jews, it is necessary to declare now, in the light of what we have affirmed above, that:

a. the Christian faith is not against Jewish people or Judaism as such;

b. anti-Jewish teaching and practices by Christians must be stopped and eradicated;

c. however much Christians may want to point to what God has done in Jesus Christ for Israel and all humanity, they cannot appropriately say that God's election of and covenant with Israel have been canceled;

d. Christians today have an urgent responsibility to converse and cooperate with, and to affirm Jewish people as the special kindred of Christians (before God);

e. In acknowledging God's covenant with Israel, Christians today must take seriously the meaning of land to Jewish people and the relation of land to the contemporary state of Israel. [The Church and the Jewish People: A Study Guide for the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)] devotes a chapter to the question of the State of Israel and Jewish/Christian relations. It points out that in the Bible God is always giving the land "to Israel in trust. Israel is to live upon the land responsibly, practicing justice, caring for the land, seeing to the needs of the poor and the stranger, while also enjoying its fruits and benefits." The gift and obligation of land pertain equally today to relations between Israel and the Palestinian people. In the past the General Assembly has passed four resolutions, numbered 7377, 8133, 8325, and 8934, on the situation in the Middle East. Each of these resolutions advocates peace and justice for all parties in the region and addresses such matters as arms limitations and recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organization. This statement from the Theology Commission is a theological statement on Jewish-Christian relationships and is to be taken in the context of the General Assembly's moral concern for justice and peace in the Middle East.
... into covenant, and acted in Jesus Christ for the redemption of the whole world.

study and conversation should be:

a. undertaken in earnest by all manifestations of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ);

b. given oversight, coordination, and focus by the Council on Christian Unity;

c. further stimulated, nurtured, and perpetuated by a study guide, The Church and the Jewish People (St. Louis: Christian Board of Publication, 1993), from the Commission on Theology, that would elaborate a wide range of theological issues and historical knowledge about relations between Christians and Jews, and provide practical guidance for the church's conduct in relation to Jewish people.
