The Women's International War Crimes Tribunal on Japan's Military Sexual Slavery was held in Tokyo, January 8-12. The tribunal was a mock trial held to bring to the world's attention the injustice suffered by the Comfort Women and Japanese government's gross dereliction in redressing the matter. Women's groups from eight countries collaborated to set up the trial, which was participated in by more than 450 attendees, including victims, lawyers, judges and scholars, from around the world. The four judges, headed by the former president of the U.N. Yugoslavia war crimes tribunal, Gabrielle McDonald, found the late Emperor Hirohito guilty for his army's policy of forcing foreign women to work as sex slaves during World War II. They also found that the victims have a right to claim compensation from Japan.

No. 0116
(Sense-of-the-Assembly)
ON BRINGING JUSTICE AND RECONCILIATION TO COMFORT WOMEN
ADOPTED by the General Assembly

Background Information

"Comfort Women is a euphemism for 200,000 or so mostly Asian women whom Japan had dragooned or lured into sexual enslavement for the gratification of its soldiers during World War II. At the time of their abduction, most of these women were teenagers of varying nationalities--Chinese, Okinawan, Filipina, Indonesian, Korean. The women were sent to the frontlines of the Japanese imperial army, locked up in shacks, and forced to have sex with ten to thirty men a day. In the course of their enslavement, multitudes of the women were murdered, their bodies dumped like trash. When the war was over, many of them could not return home for shame or lack of means, and were forced to live out their lives in foreign lands. Even those who did return lived lives that were permanently disfigured by the exploitation.

For decades, the women feared to talk about their sexual enslavement. Meanwhile, the Japanese government flatly denied any wrongdoing on its part in the recruitment and running of the Comfort Corps, insisting that the women were prostitutes paid for their services. Finally, unable any longer to forbear the Japanese government's dissembling, in the early 1990s, former Comfort Women from South Korea and elsewhere began to speak out, giving testimonies of their horrid experiences. Then in 1992, no longer able to dispute the mounting evidence, the Japanese government finally acknowledged its army's involvement in the Comfort Corps.

Even so, to this day, the Japanese government has refused to address the issue justly. It has refused to offer official apology and just recompense to the surviving victims. The Japanese government has stonewalled despite the fact that in 1996 United Nations Human Rights Commission found it guilty of sexually enslaving young women during World War II. It continues to stonewall even though in December 2000 the Women's International War Crimes Tribunal on Japan's Military Sexual Slavery found it guilty of war crimes for the sexual enslavement.¹
